Texas Tech School of Banking Begins 43rd Session in Lubbock

(LUBBOCK) – The Texas Tech School of Banking, hosted by the Rawls College of Business, is in its 43rd session this year. The event will begin Sunday, Aug. 14 and run through Friday, Aug. 19 at the Rawls College of Business.

The event, serving to educate the future community bankers, will consist of 60 professionals from Texas, New Mexico and Oklahoma, whom are leaders in banking or other financial service industry professions. The participants are able to interact with industry leaders and discuss the business and a variety of other topics that deal with real-world cases.

“This event provides an opportunity for tomorrow’s leadership in banking to learn from today’s banking leaders and their peers in a refreshing learning environment,” Scott Hein, chair of finance and faculty director, said. “Attendees should come away from the School of Banking with both a much broader understanding, as well as a more current understanding of the banks they work for and the competition.”

The Texas Tech School of Banking, which was first established in 1973, provides future leaders in the financial services industry with the skills, tools and perspective to understand the big picture of the rapidly changing financial services industry. Graduates will have up-to-date knowledge of all major areas of banking, a fresh network of colleagues and will be equipped to anticipate and respond to changes in the dynamic industry.

Mary Lange, president of Independent Bankers Association of Texas, and Jodey Arrington, president of Scott Laboratories, Inc., will serve as the keynote speakers at the event. Both speakers bring unique perspectives and years of professional experience, as well as great leadership and effectiveness in the roles they have served within the community.

The session is only open to registered participants in the industry. For specific questions regarding the event, visit ttubankschool.ba.ttu.edu or email stephanie.bohn@ttu.edu.
